Building South Schuylkill

One Spark Can Start Something Bigger

September 2026

Sometimes a project changes more than the place it is meant to improve. Sometimes it changes the people doing the work, too.

That is what happened this summer as South Schuylkill Unified prepared its Main Street Matters facade improvement grant application for downtown Schuylkill Haven. In just three weeks, a group of volunteers helped take an idea from conversation to a complete grant application, and in the process, I saw our Main Street model come to life in a way I had not seen before.

The project began with one volunteer who simply said, "Let's schedule a two-hour working session." She brought lunch for everyone. We came together around a table, talked through possible projects and funding opportunities, and by the end of that meeting, we had a timeline, tasks, assignments, and clear next steps.

From there, our volunteers took ownership. They helped envision the facade program, created the framework, conducted outreach, collected applications, served on the review committee, gathered data, contributed to the grant narrative, and took their responsibilities seriously every step of the way. This was not a project that staff handed to volunteers to complete. It became their project, and they made it happen.

We did not simply meet the deadline. We submitted the application early.

Even more encouraging, we received more applications than the amount of grant funding we were eligible to request could support. That response demonstrated something important: there is a real need for this type of investment in our downtown. Local property and business owners are ready to make improvements, and there is an appetite for programs that help turn private investment into visible community progress.

The support extended well beyond the applicants themselves. We received more than 20 letters of support from across the region, including surrounding municipalities, elected officials, nonprofit organizations, government agencies, businesses, and residents. That level of encouragement reinforced that downtown revitalization is not the responsibility of one organization, one municipality, or one group of volunteers. It is shared work.

The experience has energized our entire organization. It has encouraged us to think bigger about the ways SSU can directly support downtown local businesses across our region. We are already seeking additional funding for commercial facade improvements, and we intend to continue pursuing these opportunities in future funding rounds. We are also beginning conversations about other practical ways we can support business owners, property owners, and the long-term vitality of our downtown.

What excites me most is imagining what this work could look like a year from now. A single improved storefront may seem small on its own, but many improvements together can change how a downtown looks, feels, and functions. They can signal pride, investment, momentum, and confidence in the future of a community.

This project also reminded me why Main Street is designed to be community-driven. The strongest ideas do not always begin with a formal plan or a large meeting. Sometimes they begin with one person willing to say, "I have an idea. Let's get together and figure out how to make it happen." One person creates the spark. Others bring their skills, relationships, time, and energy. Before long, an idea becomes a project.

From start to finish, this process represented Main Street at its best: the community saw an opportunity, developed a vision, divided the work, supported one another, and worked together to make it happen.

There is much more to do, and there is room for more people at the table. If you have ideas for South Schuylkill, want to support local businesses, care about how our communities look and feel, or simply want to contribute your skills to something meaningful, I hope you will consider getting involved with South Schuylkill Unified. You do not need to be an expert. You just need to care enough to show up, share an idea, and be willing to help.

You might be the person with the next spark.

One region. Shared goals. Real progress.
